Occurrence of 20-hydroxyecdysone biosynthetic genes during the development of the early Holotrich ciliate Tetrahymena pyriformis. In Tetrahymena, the biosynthetic pathway of ecdysone (20-hydroxyecdysone), the major molting hormone in protozoans, includes two cycloheximide-sensitive enzymes, farnesyl-diphosphate farnesyltransferase (FPTase) and delta(24)-sterol methyl transferase (24-SMTase). The genes encoding these enzymes are also expressed in the mid-intestine of some ciliates. We investigated the occurrence of 20-hydroxyecdysone biosynthetic genes during the development of the early Holotrich ciliate Tetrahymena pyriformis. Two types of genes were identified based on their transcription and protein expression. The first type of gene was identified in these animals, with a single gene encoding an FPTase and 24-SMTase. The expression of these genes was detected before the appearance of ciliary axonemes. The second type of gene encoded a single enzyme responsible for biosynthesis of 20-hydroxyecdysone, FPTase. A single copy of FPTase was expressed in the forebody of the animal and the transcript level was greatest during the first 24 hr after starvation. A single gene encoding a putative PPPS/GPPS synthase homologue was also identified. Expression of this gene was first detected in the forebody 24 hr after starvation,
