Comparison of the 11C-labeled putative biomarkers for positron emission tomography imaging of neurodegenerative diseases in preclinical and clinical studies. The tracer properties of 11C-labeled putative neurodegeneration biomarkers, such as the glucocerebrosidase (GCase) and its substrate, [11C]PBR28, the sphingosine 1-phosphate receptor (S1PR) 2 agonist [11C]FIMU, and [11C]NXY-059, were evaluated using two types of preclinical studies and five clinical studies. PET brain images of the murine brain were obtained at specific times after tracer injection to evaluate the tracer kinetic properties. One preclinical study evaluated 11C-labeled putative biomarkers in rats after treatment with PBR28 and fingolimod, which bind to S1PR2. Another preclinical study used [11C]FIMU to evaluate the efficacy of fingolimod in reducing brain [11C]FIMU binding. Clinical PET studies compared the tracer distribution of the putative biomarkers in the brains of patients with Alzheimer's disease (AD) and healthy controls (HC). In the preclinical studies, radio-HPLC data showed that the kinetics of [11C]PBR28 in the brains of PBR28-treated rats were slower than those of GCase and [11C]NXY-059, but they were faster than those of [11C]FIMU. Fingolimod treatment reduced binding of [11C]FIMU in the brains of healthy controls. In clinical PET studies, the putative biomarkers showed no significant difference in the binding potential values for HC and AD patients. However, the time course of [11C]PBR28 in the brain revealed a higher signal in the AD brain
