According to Files.com: On July 15, 2007, a person was identified in the Keymaker database as having stolen a couple of hundred thousand dollars worth of items from a large number of computers. It is suspected that the person employed a key-stealing malware and at some point, the malware was installed on a computer, which then installed the key-stealing software on a large number of computers. In all likelihood, the computer theft was a sophisticated event, and the Keymaker software was used to extract the serial numbers and other information from the victim's computer. In 2011, a person was identified in the Keymaker database as having stolen a computer which contained software associated with the Keymaker malware. The software was identified by the same digital signature which is associated with the software that was used to create and install the Keymaker malware.
