It is a question most of us have been asked at some point during our lives. We are social beings. Even if we are feeling miserable, we want to be part of a crowd. This often leads to the misconception that we want to be around happy people. In reality, happiness is not contagious. The more likely response to a happy person is probably a smile or perhaps laughter. Think about it. There are many times you go out with your friends only to end up feeling sadder than you did when you got there. Why is this? Maybe you do not feel like talking to the people you are there with. Maybe the conversation just did not go your way. Regardless of the reason, there are times when being around happy people can also be bad. There is a big difference between being around someone who is happy versus being around someone who is miserable. The truth is that the happier person's demeanor is most likely influencing you. Why? Because happiness is not infectious. People who are happier are not necessarily trying to make other people happy. It is because of this that our environment has a strong influence on our moods. Humans have been shown to be susceptible to the bad moods of those around us, even when we are not aware of their moods. In one experiment, researchers had people read the words "I am a happy person" or "I am a sad person." Those who read the words "I am a happy person" became more happy than those who read the words "I am a sad person."
