The Aurora Hoard The Aurora Hoard was a copper alloy spear tip, made in the LaTona culture of Moche, Peru, on the Peruvian coast near the equator, about 1,000 years ago. Type and site Made of seven separate pieces of malleable copper alloy which are made highly irregularly in both shape and size, the metalwork was probably originally meant to be worn on a belt or at the neck. Two of the pieces are quite large, measuring 17 cm (7 in) across the shoulder and 35 cm (14 in) long. Most of the material is presented in a set which includes two of the larger pieces, a few of the remaining pieces, and a fragment of an earlier type. The fragments were discovered in 1995, in the central plaza of a large earthwork known as the El Castillo complex at Moche (dated c. AD 400–700). The site was first excavated in 1963 by George Frison. Description The pieces look like fragments of a spear, but fragments are what they are. The body of the weapon is too irregular for any clear reading. It has a slender, approximately 45 cm (18 in) long shaft with a blunt end and a small chisel-type point terminating in a turquoise-colored knob. The pieces are made of malleable copper alloys using tools such as hammers. Some pieces include no tool marks, which makes other pieces harder to determine. Identification The pieces are marked with variations of a Mesoamerican motif known to archaeologists as the "Aurora motif". Other weapons of the same type have been associated with the Early-Middle Formative (
