Contrast-induced nephropathy (CIN) is the third leading cause of hospital-acquired acute renal failure. We examined the definition, clinical characteristics, and outcomes of CIN in a population of 4,434 patients undergoing coronary angiography or other cardiac catheterization who had serum creatinine determinations at baseline, after 4 to 6 hours, and on the first and second postoperative day. There were 57 CIN events during the hospitalization. The peak mean serum creatinine level was 2.9 mg/dl. The incidence of CIN was highest in patients with diabetes (5.2%), coronary artery disease (7.6%), congestive heart failure (5.7%), and preprocedural hypotension (7.0%). The remaining CIN was observed in 5.2% of patients without any predisposing factors. Only 5.2% of patients with CIN experienced CIN in the setting of volume administration alone. A more common cause of CIN was radiocontrast, including the presence of intravascular air, contributing to 7.1% of CIN in our study. The mortality of CIN was 4.8% (95% confidence interval, 3.0% to 7.1%). The overall in-hospital mortality was 6.1% (157 patients). No predictors of CIN were found. We conclude that CIN is associated with increased risk of in-hospital mortality. However, the clinical impact of CIN in the hospital setting may be underestimated because other clinical conditions contribute to the process of CIN. Complex human cranial asymmetry. Part II: The stress response. The biomechanics of the skull, and in particular cranial asymmetry, have not been studied in the context of the stress response. This concept of the "stress response" is now well understood in experimental biology and physiology as a complex process that involves neuroendocrine and immunological aspects. We have proposed, in Part I of this two-part
