Apr 27, 2020Q: How to test a WebSocket connection in an Android/Java app? My goal is to establish a socket connection with a server, send some data, then receive some data from the server, and do all of this in the context of the Android application. I read this article about Socket Programming in Android, and the article is very clear about the first two steps - making and receiving a connection. To test the connection itself I'd like to be able to connect with the server, send data to it, and read the return data. Does anybody know how to do this using either Android's Socket class or the AsyncTask class? It seems like I can't use the code in the article because it talks about sending and receiving data via sockets from a remote server. The server I need to connect to is very close to the phone, on the same network. A: I don't have a phone to try, but this might help you get on the right track: Have your server send messages to a short-lived socket you keep open. On the client, periodically read from that socket and respond accordingly. That's the basic idea. To make the client socket short-lived, on the client side, whenever you call socket.connect(), create an AsyncTask to handle the response, then call socket.disconnect() on it when the response is received. The server will need to ignore client requests for a while, but then respond to the last socket.connect() received. main class type UserContainer
