Common buses include the Peripheral Component Interconnect (PCI) bus and the Universal Serial Bus (USB), and are widely used as data communication links between digital devices. Some buses include provision for a link layer for providing services to the end users of the bus. For example, in the PCI standard, a link layer provides error correction, packet retransmission, power management, and other services to end users of the bus. Typically, this link layer is implemented in software, using an embedded processor, and may require an external processor to communicate with the link layer. For example, to retrieve a command to the link layer, an application must request information from the link layer via a software interface. Most of the time, end users must request information or commands from the link layer via a software interface, such as a software interface provided by a web browser. Further, the link layer must be configured to communicate with a particular device, and must be able to determine which device is coupled to the link layer for communication. However, since the link layer is executing in software, and since the link layer communicates with the end user via the application, there is a risk that the application will not execute, or will execute improperly. Thus, the link layer may be susceptible to buffer overflow and other security vulnerabilities, which may result in loss of functionality and potential denial of service (DOS) attacks, which can disable the link layer and interrupt or disturb services provided by the link layer.Q: Accessing xml in the web.config file I am using the following xml
