A federal judge on Tuesday accused the American Civil Liberties Union of using a lie to put Trump's travel ban in the court. U.S. District Judge Derrick Watson asserted that the U.S. Government has not complied with his April 5 ruling that lifted the restrictions on restrictions on citizens from certain Muslim-majority nations. "The Government has not come close to providing even a conclusory justification for its suspicion-based approach," Watson wrote. "In other words, the Government has not satisfied its burden to rebut the presumption of discriminatory intent." Watson's criticism comes after the Department of Justice asked for another extension to submit a plan to comply with the ruling. A Department of Justice spokesperson said they are still reviewing the court's order. The judge on Tuesday said there "is not a single word in the injunction that stands for travel bans or limits on entry from the seven affected countries." "There's not a scintilla of evidence that any national security threat exists," Watson said. Watson cited the fact that the "current version" of the travel ban "leaves intact the initial travel ban's all-inclusive standard for classifying a country as eligible or ineligible for the travel ban." Watson said the travel ban still should be put on hold until the U.S. Government has complied with his ruling.

"Plaintiffs and the public have been waiting since June the 16th of this year for the Government to produce the results of the national security review ordered by this Court," he said. "The results of that review are due now and we know they will not justify the Government's otherwise unconstitutional travel ban." The Trump administration started implementing parts of the travel ban after a federal court blocked the previous version.
