The most widely accepted formula for calculating body mass index (BMI) is this: $(\text{weight in kilograms} \div (\text{height in meters} \times \text{height in meters})) \times 703 = \text{Mass Index (weight in kg} \div (\text{height in m}^2))$ The formula is commonly used for individuals who want to determine if they are healthy (not overweight) or if they have put on some weight or are overweight. BMI values tend to range from 16 (very thin) to more than 50 (morbidly obese). Just below the 16 value is the underweight category. The BMI is sometimes divided by 2.5 to produce a percentage. Related articles The sector is ripe with opportunities and new businesses are continually being launched to provide a complete and comprehensive portfolio of travel-related services to ensure they remain ahead of the pack. As an emerging industry, there is undoubtedly the potential for huge success and the greatest impact, but the potential is much larger than the current market is prepared to accept, putting startups in a precarious position. A combination of the venture capital bubble and ill-prepared entrepreneurs has created a large number of small businesses in which the focus has been on the bottom line and not on the importance of good business planning. The upcoming SME-Fund Austria (SMEEF) is set to help bridge the gap and start introducing both the necessary planning skills and greater focus on creating value. The need for more efficient ways of business and communication, both in the private and in the public sector, is highly beneficial to the economy. This need is understandable, but the introduction of mass collaboration and technological revolution has resulted in a fragmentation of the existing business environment. In addition, the use of information and communication technologies (ICT) in the private sphere has become problematic due to privacy considerations. The implementation of IT systems to improve the efficiency of communication and business transactions between government institutions and citizens is therefore an important subject. As a beginning-level networker, I can understand the concept and see where it can be beneficial. To me, it's often a matter of knowing how to break down objectives into steps and getting some good tools to make this as easy and fun as possible. I keep track of who has contact with whom
